Excerpt: . . . to greet our own--Now--are they Gods alone Who understands Who, bending low to fold The fingers as of old In pressure warm, But muses, -- Surely she Will reach one touch to me, And break the charm! And yet she does not stir;--Such silence lies on her We hear the drip 716 THE MOTHER SAINTED Of tear-drops as we press Our kisses answerless On brow and lip. Not een the yearning touch Of lips she loved so much She made their breath One with her own, will she Give answer to and be Wooed back from death. And though he kneel and plead Who was her greatest need, And on her cheek Lay the soft baby-face In its old resting-place, She will not speak. So brave she was, and good--In worth of womanhood So like the snow--She, smiling, gave her life To blend the name...
