Excerpt: .the case since the subject The reading and solving of Problem I by Subject G is described in Plate X. The conditions of the problem and the identity of the numerals were evidently grasped during the first five or six pauses. The numerals were not re-read and the answer was recorded during either Pause 8 or Pause 9, or during both. was able to produce the correct answer without ever looking at the numeral again. During pauses 6 and 8 the subject may have been occupied with mental computation. This suggestion is offered as a possible explanation of the fact that Pause 6 was not located on any reading material, mt was nevertheless the longest of all pauses used in connection with the;t reading of Problem 2 by Subject G and the process of adding the two s. 1. It does not seem probable that Pause 7 was needed by this as a re-reading pause in this problem. If computation was ng during pauses 6 and 7, evidently the eyes were roving around direction. Such undirected roving occurred very rarely, if at nost cases, the eyes of the subjects were fixed on the numerals: re involved in the computation. irst reading, the re-reading, and the solution of Problem 1 by k4 are shown in Plate XI. Apparently the subject became m the first few words of the line as is indicated by the backward rd movements of the pauses. Such confusion in the reading...
